Liz Miller's powerful documentary tells the story of residents of Highland Park, Michigan in their struggle against privatization of the local water supply. Highlighting how a system prone to corruption affects basic human rights, this moving account foreshadows what could be in store for municipalities around the world facing their own water challenges.

New York State's own water supply is currently threatened by gas drilling in the vast Marcellus shale layer which spans three states. We will have Joe Levine, co-chair of NYH20, on hand before the screening to discuss this critical local issue and what we can do to prevent the destruction of our water shed.
